I'm not just trying to take photos—I'm building something bigger. My dream is to create a recognizable, high-end brand through Namli InCompany Photography, one that's known for emotional, confidence-driven imagery with a refined, elevated feel. I want my work to stand out, not just locally but on a larger scale, blending real, raw moments with powerful, almost editorial-level visuals. I'm drawn to expanding creatively as well—stepping into high-fashion, fantasy concepts, and magazine-style work—so I can establish myself not just as a photographer, but as a creative force with a distinct voice.

My goals reflect that balance between business and artistry. I'm consistently working to grow my client base through promotions like family sessions, mommy-and-me, boudoir, graduations, and weddings, making sure I stay active and visible in my community. At the same time, I'm pushing my work toward a more luxury, high-end direction—refining my branding, improving my layouts, and elevating the overall presentation so I can position myself as a premium photographer rather than just another option. I'm focused on building not only income, but also long-term value and recognition.

I've already achieved a lot in that process. I've developed a clear style that blends raw emotion with polished visuals, and I've built a system that allows me to consistently create, refine, and deliver strong work across different types of shoots. I know how to turn my images into ads, how to shape a visual identity, and how to keep evolving my work. I've proven to myself that I can take an idea and bring it to life, which is something I take pride in.

At the same time, I know my challenges are about focus and positioning. I work across multiple styles—family, fantasy, fashion, events—which can sometimes make it harder to define a single, clear brand identity. I'm also working through balancing my love for raw, emotional photography with my drive for high-fashion polish, making sure those two sides come together instead of competing. Another challenge is aligning my pricing and overall brand perception with the level I'm aiming for, while also managing everything that comes with running a business. I'm in a phase where I'm growing from being a strong working photographer into building a distinct, high-end brand—and I know the next step is refining my direction and stepping fully into that level.

My dreams and goals consist of expressing desires to break molds and redefine beauty standards. Through compassion, positivity and kindness I know I can achieve these dreams and goals I have. My challenges consist of not fitting typical modeling standards having a curvy figure and large bust. My goal is to break these standards so all women feel beautiful about themselves.
